

Check Answer Show AnswerFlag for Review

Introduced by Italian merchants resident in London during the sixteenth century, in England life insurance remained until the end of the seventeenth century a specialized contract between individual underwriters and their clients, typically being ship owners, overseas merchants, or professional moneylenders.

- in England life insurance remained until the end of the seventeenth century a specialized contract between individual underwriters and their clients, typically being
- in England life insurance had remained until the end of the seventeenth century a specialized contract between individual underwriters with their clients, who typically were
- until the end of the seventeenth century life insurance in England had remained a specialized contract between individual underwriters and their clients, typically
- life insurance in England remained until the end of the seventeenth century a specialized contract between individual underwriters and their clients, typically
- life insurance remained until the end of the seventeenth century in England a specialized contract between individual underwriters with their clients, who typically were

? Help↩ End Exam➔ Review ScreenNext ➔