

7.1.5 Past Perfect

Construction: The grammatical construction of past perfect tense is:

Had + past participle (refer to section 2.2.5 for participles)

For example: had come, had done, had revealed, had studied etc.

Past perfect tense should be used in the following scenarios:

1. Scenario 1: An event that happened at some point “before” another event in the past - This represents the most common scenario of past perfect tense. This is used to express the scenario that an event happened at some point (expressed as past perfect) “before” another event (expressed as simple past, depicted by the star in the illustration below) in the past.

For example:

Michelle had already left for school by the time Peter came to pick her up.

- The event of Michelle leaving for school (expressed as past perfect) happened at some time “before” Peter came to pick her up (expressed as simple past).

James realized his mistake, but the damage had been done.

- The event of damage having been done (expressed as past perfect) happened at some time “before” James realized his mistake (expressed as simple past).

A sentence based on official question (#124, OG-13: She was less successful after she had emigrated...).

Less popular in the latter part of her career than she was in the initial years, Elizabeth Taylor was born in a northwestern suburb of London and went on to become one of the most famous film stars.

Analysis: As per the sentence, two different phases of Elizabeth Taylor’s life are being discussed: Latter part of her career and initial years. Hence the earlier of these two phases (initial years) should be in past perfect (she had been), and not in simple past (she was). So, the correct sentence is:

Less popular in the latter part of her career than she had been in the initial years, Elizabeth Taylor was born in a northwestern suburb of London and went on to become one of the most famous film stars.

Note:

- a) Past perfect is used in sentences which depict two events, both of which happened in the past. The event that happened earlier is depicted in past perfect. In the example above (James realized his mistake, but the damage had been done), the two events are that happened in the past are: James realizing his mistake and the damage being done. Out of these events, damage being done happened earlier and is depicted in past perfect (..but the damage had been done). For this reason, past perfect is also referred to as the tense that depicts past of the past: Two events happened in the past, but the event that happened in the past of the past is depicted in past perfect.

- b) As a corollary, in a sentence that uses past perfect, the event that is expressed in past perfect happened first, while the event that is expressed in simple past happened later. So, past perfect is used to establish a chronological sequence among two past events. However, in situations in which the chronological sequence is very evident (for example, by using specific times), the usage of past perfect should be avoided. For example: Tony came to office at 9:00 am and finished his work by 5:00 pm. In this sentence, the usage of specific times (9:00 am and 5:00 pm) make the sequence of these two past events very evident; hence this entire sentence is in simple past, and past perfect would be an incorrect usage in this sentence.
- c) As noted above, past perfect is used to establish a chronological sequence among two past events. However, while depicting two past events, if the sentence uses words such as before or after, then the usage of these words makes the chronological sequence between of two past events very evident. Hence, in such case, the use of past perfect is optional. For example, both the following sentences would be considered correct:

Hawaii was a self-governed territory before it became a full-fledged state in 1959.

Hawaii had been a self-governed territory before it became a full-fledged state in 1959.

- d) Notice the commonality between present perfect and past perfect. In present perfect, an event happened at some unspecific time before now; in past perfect, an event happened at some unspecific time before another event in the past.

2. Scenario 2: An extended event that continued until another event happened in the past - This is used to express the situation that an event happened for a longer duration in the past (expressed as past perfect) until another event (expressed as simple past, depicted by the star in the illustration below) in the past.

For example:

Peter did not qualify in the exam, because he had not studied for the entire year.

- The event of Peter not studying happened for a longer duration (entire year in this case) in the past (expressed as past perfect: had not studied) until another event (Peter not qualifying, depicted as star in the above picture) in the past.

His parents were not surprised at this success, because they had always believed in him.

- The event of his parents believing in him happened for a longer duration (always in this case) in the past (expressed as past perfect: had always believed) until another event (his parents not getting surprised, depicted as star in the above picture) in the past.

A sentence based on official question (#37, OG-13: Some buildings that were destroyed...):

The "Rana Plaza" in Bangladesh that collapsed, resulting in heavy casualties, was constructed with poor building material.

Analysis: As per the sentence, two different aspects of the building “Rana Plaza” are being discussed: It collapsed resulting in heavy casualties and it was constructed with poor building material. Hence the earlier of these two phases (constructed with poor building material) should be in past perfect (she had been), and not in simple past (she constructed). So, the correct sentence is:

The "Rana Plaza" in Bangladesh that collapsed, resulting in heavy casualties, had been constructed with poor building material.

Another sentence based on GMATPrep question (In 1981 children in the United States spent an average of ...):

In 2007, a typical web user spent less than 4 hours a month on Facebook; by 2011, that figure went up to 8 hours.

Analysis: There are actually 3 events that this sentence talks about:

(a) The time that a typical web user spent on Facebook in 2007

(b) 4 years passing since then (between 2007 and 2011)

(c) But, before those 4 years passed (within those years, as indicated by the words by 2011), that figure (the time that a typical web user spent on Facebook) went up to 8 hours.

However, note that (c) happened before (b) and hence, (c) should be in past perfect (in this case: had gone up). It should also be noted that in 2007 is a specific time, and so, a typical web user spent less than 4 hours a month on Facebook is correctly expressed in simple past (remember that simple past is used to express the situation that an event started and finished at a specific time in the past); on the other hand, by 2011 is an unspecified time because this could refer to any time in or before 2011), and so, a perfect tense (past perfect in this case) would correctly depict this situation. So, the correct sentence is:

In 2007, a typical web user spent less than 4 hours a month on Facebook; by 2011, that figure had gone up to 8 hours.
