

Prepositional phrases at the beginning of a clause

In sentences that start with a prepositional phrase (as is the case above, where prepositional phrase In a letter to the then US President Franklin Roosevelt starts the sentence/clause), the prepositional phrase modifies the action (verb) of the clause that follows this prepositional phrase.

It should be noted that because these prepositional phrases modify the verb (of the clause that follows this prepositional phrase), these prepositional phrases are Adverbial modifiers (remember Adverbs generally modify verbs; refer to section 2.1.5) and hence, such prepositional phrases answer the questions how, when, where, how much and why.

Let's again look at the following sentence:

In an Alabama prison cell, Martin Luther King drafted an impassioned defense of his use of nonviolent actions against racial discrimination.

So, in the above sentence, the prepositional phrase in an Alabama prison cell modifies drafted, the action/verb of the clause that follows this prepositional phrase. In this case, the prepositional phrase answers the question: where the defense was drafted: in an Alabama prison cell.
